The Irish tramways bill which has just passed the house of lords is a measure of considerable importance as affecting the material development of Ireland. It contains provisions for devoting £100,000 toward the aid of emigration. Mr. Parnell was not entirely satisfied with the clause. While acknowledging the benevolent motives of Mr. Tuke and his friends, he promised that he would prove that the people removed had been partly shopkeepers and partly laborers, and not farmers at all: that consolidation had not taken place and that the emigrants had fared very ill. Another portion of the bill provides for migration within the borders of Ireland by establishing conditions for advance to companies for purchase of laads on condition of resale. The portion affecting the construction of steam tramways, with a guarantee of one-half on the local rates and the other half from the imperial funds, not exceeding the modest figure of two per cent interest, was favorably received, though the Irish members doubted whether the grand juries are to be trusted with the initiation and prosecution of tramways.

The workmen are laying down a new style of rail on the Central road. It is higher, and by a different shape on the inside the flange of the car wheel will not wear on it so fast as with the old kind. The average use of a steel rail is three or four years where there is as much traffic as the Central has.

There is every reason why there should be a general turn out at the annual school meeting next Monday for the election of three members of the Board of Education to fill the vacancy of that number of the GRAND OPERA HOUSE board whose terms expire soon. We again call your attention, therefore, to the meeting referred to. Let every voter be on hand.

George Hudson, an employé of the T., A. A. & G. T. R. R., on last Friday morning about seven o'clock met with a serious accident the particulars of which we give herewith. As the gravel train, on which young Hudson was brakeman, started for the pit, backing up, he took a position on the front car. When the train reached Lower Town a number of the hands waiting there signalled the engineer to stop for them, and Hudson stepping to the brake lost his balance while setting it and fell between the rails, with John R. Miner is recently back from the train moving slowly. None of the wheels touched the fallen man, but the fixtures of one truck in passing over bruised him and broke his right leg between the knee and the trunk. Drs. Darling and Kapp responded to the call for medical service. Hemorrhage set in about noon and for a time the limb was despaired of, but a revival of the pulse gave new hopes of saving it. The unfortunate man has no relatives here. Late news reports the injury doing nicely.

The Rev. Z. P. Wilds, well-known city missionary in New York, and brother of the late eminent Judge Wilds, of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, writes as follows:

from a severe catarrh and catarrhal cough; my appetite was poor, and my system a good deal run down. Knowing the value of AYER'S SARSAPAdown. Knowing the value of AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, by observation of many other cases, and from personal use in former years, I began taking it for the above-named disorders. My appetite improved almost from the first dose. After a short time the fever and itching were allayed, and all signs of irritation of the skin disappeared. My catarrh and cough were also cured by the same means, and my general health greatly improved, until it is now excellent. I feel a hundred per cent stronger, and I attribute these results to the use of the SARSAPARILLA, which I recommend with all confidence as the best blood medicine ever devised. I took it in small doses three times a day, and used, in all, less than two bottles. I place these facts at your service, hoping their publication may do good.

Yours respectfully, Z. P. WILDS."

And when midnight's slumber gently Calms the weary heart to rest, And the soul in joyful visions Of our childhood's day is blest; When the past, with all its music And its old remembered airs, Wakens us from our dreams we, listen For the footsteps on the stairs.

When the heart with grief is burdened With its daily toil and pain, And we feel the sun of pleasure Will not rise for us again; And the spirit breathes its sorrow Forth in silent, voiceless prayer, Then we long to hear the music, Of the footsteps on the stairs.

In the home of the hereafter, Where the waiting spirits stand, Watching for their loved ones coming To that purc, better land— Then their angel love will teach us Then their angel love the description of the footsteps on the stairs.

WAS IT A MISTAKE?

I am an old woman now, the hair that once was so brown and curled so softly is thickly strewn with gray; the longer brisk and free; but my heart is as warm and loving as ever, I think, for I know how tenderly and closely it cherishes the memory of the dear, dear friends, who gave to the passing years their all of joy or brightness. It is a little strange that among all the greetings and partings that my life has known, there is but one touch, one handclasp, that can never be forgotten, that never leaves me. How many, many times, through the years that have gone by since last I looked upon a certain dark, handsome face, it has seemed as though I felt again that clasp, true, strong and tender; especially when I was in deep sorrow, and in my dreams it has come bringing with it the same thrill of delight, and leaving behind it a feeling of having received loving comfort.

We were school-mates, he and I, strong and beautiful manhood. Ah! I now. If he remembers our rambles. our gay nonsense, the joyous laughter that bubbles up so lightly and freely from happy hearts, if he remembers our earnest talks, which I would never let go beyond a certain point of earnestness, or a certain point of personal in-

I remember telling him one day, we were in the country then, that it was "impossible to procure a horse in that place either for love or money," and I remember with a feeling that is more than "akin to pain" the look on his face as he replied, "I'll engage to find you a horse - for love." I received the reply as though it were simply intended as a merry, joking, rejoiner,—but ah. dear heart, I knew it was earnest. Most distinct of all the pictures I have of him, is the pictured memory of the last day we were together. It is sorrow to remember it, but it would be greater, keener sorrow ever to forget He came as he had come so many times before, and, as before, we had a merry, merry time, talking and laughing, joking and parrying jokes. At last, we were having a mimic quarrel over something we had real in the paper, he protested that the statement was made in one way, and I, that it was

I got the paper, saving "I would prove hyself right,"—but I never knew which was right, for he came, sat down beside me, and was "going to see for himself," he said, as he too held one side of the paper; but he slipped the other hand down and clasped the one of mine that lay in my lap-the dear, close clasp, in warms my heart yet, and I am sure if I had kept it, had had it all my life, it would have made everything so much easier and happier than it has been. I let my hand lie in his for a moment thinking that then I would release it without it seeming on purpose, for I did "Where Cilleys meet their Graves"— not wish to burt him; alas I did hurt and the practical disappearance of Mr. him far, far worse, for in an instant the Graves from public life, showed how paper was gliding to our feet on the deep and strong was the public condemfloor, and he was gathering me close nation, and how radically the general in his arms, and that I dare not let him view of the duel was changed. do-I dare not trust myself-for I was young, and father, mother, friend, one litical and sectional animosity of 1856, was not one among them all who would not have disapproved of and condemmed some of 'umner's friends met with litnoblest of women.

that night. I made him understand that our pathways must be separate. And, when a few moments later, I heard the other members of the family first one at hand, and when they entered we two were sitting side by side, looking at and talking of the illustra-tions in Nicholas Nickleby.

I have not been able to see that work since without a quiver of pain. We sat all the evening, he with his arm thrown over the back of my chair in such a manner that when I leaned back I ing oven in my lap. He never changed his position until the clock chimed out the hour of midnight; then he rose, said "good-night," simply shaking my hand at parting as he did the others, and went away-forever.

I hear of him sometimes, of his gentleness, his goodness, his patience. I hear of deeds which could only come from a noble heart. I never inquire, but I listen so eagerly, so hungrily to every word concerning him, for though we were young then, and now we are old, I still remember.

And still I ask myself, was it all a mistake that I should have let him go his way alone. Sometimes I say to myself that perhaps if we had been to gether, he would not have grown to be the man he is; but, in my lonely heart I do not believe it. If it were not a mistake, then it is all right. And if i were, the suffering and loneliness have been long, they will find their end only when this earthly life ends; but then "in the world that sets this right," per haps we may meet, and understand; and I shall be forgiven and cheered and belped forever by that clasping hand whose memory is within me always.

A Few Words of Explanation.

Milwaukee Wisconsin. George W. Peck, of Milwaukee is carrying his right hand around tied up in a big silk handkerchief. He had been bothered almost to death with anxious inquiries as to the nature of the trouble under the handkerchief, and so he has issued the following, addressed to "The general questioning puplic:"
This is a boil. Not a carbuncle. Just

I know you have had boils bigger than mine, but this one is big enough for me. I am no hog. I don't want the biggest boil.

No, I don't want another. Dueling, Past and Present. Harper's Magazine. Twenty-five years ago, at the table of a gentleman whose father had fallen some time the host remarked, emphatically, that there were occasions when it was a man's solemn duty to fight. The personal reference was too significant o permit further insistence at that table that duelling was criminal folly, and the subject of conversation was chang-The host, however, had only reiterated the familiar view of General Hamilton. His plea was, that in the state of public opinion at the time when Burr challenged him, to refuse to fight under circumstances which by the "code of honor" authorized a challenge, was to accept a brand of cowardice and of a want of gentlemanly feeling, which would banish him to a moral and social Coventry, and throw a cloud of discredcheeks that once were round and rosy are sunken and pale; the form has lost of the bravest men and one of the acutsome of its erectness, the step is no est intellects of his time, permitted a worthless fellow to murder him. Yet there is no doubt that he stated accurately the general feeling of the social circle in which he lived. There was probably not a conspicuous member of that society who was of military antecedents who would not have challenged any man who had said of him what Hamilton had said of Burr. Hamilton disdained explanation or recantation, and the result was accepted as tragical, but in a certain sense inevitable. Yet that result aroused public sentinent to the atrocity of this barbarous survival of the ordeal of private battle. That one of the most justly renowned of public men, of unsurpassed ability, should be shot to death like a mad dog, becausse he had expressed the general feeling about an unprincipled schemer, was an exasperating public misfortune. But that he should have been murdered when we were children; and when our in deference to a practice which was school days were over, he still sought me, still sent me messengers of different kinds to tell me that I was held in his thoughts, as he grew onward into strong and heavily. has been no duel which could be said to wonder if he ever thinks of those days now. If he remembers our rambles, approval. From the bright June morning, eighty years ago, when Hamilton fell at Weelawken, to the June of this year, when two foolish men shot at each other in Virginia, there has been a steady and complete change of public opinion, and the performance of this year was received with almost universal contempt, and with indignant censure of a dilitory police.

The most celebrated duel in this country since that of Hamilton and Burr was the encounter between Commodores Decatur and Barron, in 1820, near Washington, in which Decatur, like Hamilton, was mortally wounded, and likewise lived but a few hours. The quarrel was one of professional, as Burr's of political, jealously. But as the only conceivable advantage of the Hamilton duel lay in its arousing the public mind to the barbarity of quelling, the only gain from the Decatur duel was that it confirmed this conviction. In both instances there was an unspeak able shock to the country and infinite domestic anguish. Nothing else was achieved. Neither general manners nor morals were improved, nor was the fame of either combatant heightened, nor public confidence in the men or admiration of their public services increased. In both cases it was a calamity alleviated solely by the resolution which it awakened that such calamities should not occur again.

Such a resolution, indeed, could not at once preval, and eighteen years after Decauter was killed, Jonathan Cirley, of Maine, was killed in a duel at Washington by William J Graves, of Kentucky This event occurred forty-five years ago but the outery with which it was receiv ed even at that time-one of the newspaper moralists lasping into rhyme as he deplored the cruel custom which led excellent men to the fatal field-

THE FARM.

Clover as a Means of Increasing the Wheat Field. Alternating clover with the wheat crop is another means of increasing production. The clover is esteemed in England as the best preparation of the land for wheat, and a good clover sod is the best fertilizer. Messrs. Lowes and Gilbert, on a portion of unmanured experimental field, tested the value of clover as a preparatory crop for wheat. Wheat in a duel, the conversation fell upon grown after clover yielded twenty-nine duelling, and after it had proceeded for and a half bushels per acre, while on an adjoining lot, where wheat followed wheat, only fifteen and a half bushels were obtained. A Soit iern farmer had a large field which yielded only ten bushels per acre. He seeded it to clover, mowed the clover for hay one year and pastured it the second year, then plowed and sowed wheat in the autumn. The result was that he harvested an excellent crop of wheat, yielding at the rate of twenty bushels per acre. Dr. Voelcker, chemist to the Royal Society of England, conducted a series of careful investigations to determine the cause of the benefit of a clover crop as a preparatory crop for wheat. The conclusions arrived at are that during the growth of clover a large amount of nitrogeneous matter accumulates in the soil; this accumulation, which is greatest in the surface soil, is due to the decaying leaves dropped during the growth of clover, and to an abundance of roots, containing from 11 to per cent of nitrogen; and that the nitrogeneous matters in the clover remains and on their gradual decay are finally transformed into nitrates, thus affording a continuous source of food on which cereal crops specially delight to grow. By removing the clover roots from a square foot of soil, analyzing them, and calculating the total quantity of an acre from that datum, Dr. Voelcker found that in the soil of an acre of clover land, mowed once for hay and afterward left to seed, there were 3,622 pounds of roots which contained 511 pounds of nitrogen. This amount of nitrogen would be sufficient for a large crop of wheat. Much of the wheat land in this country which yields only ten or twelve bushels of wheat per acre, might be rendered much more productive by alternating the wheat with clover occasionally.

Items for the Farmers It is never advisable to transplant bearing raspberry bushes. Young roots if put out in the fall will come in bearing quite as soon as those that have been in bearing, and will remain healthy much

If by neglect the wild mustard or charlock has been pulled from fields of spring grain, it should not be taken to the barn. Better make a stack of the grain, that the weed may be kept in the field where grown, and not carried over the farm.

An exchange says that the nests of the tent caterpillar can be destroyed by a swab affixed to a long pole, and wet in spirits of turpentine, and it will also kill all the insects it touches.

The rust on wheat is not apt to do much damage unless it attacks the stalks. Where this is the fact it is called 'black rust," and the more quickly the grain is cut the better for the berry.

A New Jersey peach-grower says he cares nothing for the yellows. Give all over the ground where the roots feed, and wash the bodies each spring with ye, and the yellows can not only be prevented, but cured.

Professor Arnold offers a caution against straining after excessively large yields of butter. The Jersey cow, he says, has been over-rated because the endency of this animal to turn all it eats into the cream pot makes into butter what in some other breeds would go to tallow. It is, in fact, a naturally made oleomargarine.

If one of the most valuable properties of land plaster is to absorb and hold ammonia until it can be taken up by the plant, and if many plants have the power of absorbing ammonia from the at-mosphere through their leaves, may it not be the most profitable way to use plaster to scatter it over the leaves of he plants while they are damp? Dr, Darlington of Chester County, Pa, who s a very close observer, says that he has proved the above to be the best method of using plaster.

Champion Snake Stories.

New York Sun.

"You see," said the stranger, when he eels had stopped to rest, "I come from a snake country my self—the West Indies Out there about two-thirds of the people are engaged in snake culture. The smaller snakes are converted into ladies' breastpins, earrings, bracelets and headdresses. As the snakes are converted iuto these ornaments by simply being frozen, it frequently happens that they thaw out in a heated ballroom, and it is a common occurrence for a lady's breastpin or necklace to suddenly begin to wiggle or hiss. Now, if you doubt my word I can refer you to the United States consul, and the governor of the Island of St. Martin. "By the way, speaking of these genlemen, reminds me of a little incident. It is quite the fashion there for men to carry a snake-stick or cane. These sticks are made out of a single snake frozen and twisted into any desirable shape. One day I dropped into the office of the United States consul, and soon the governor and several other gentlemen arrived. We were engaged in a heated discussion when we were startled by a hissing sound, and, turning, discovered all our sticks, which we had placed in the corner of the room, a wiggling mass of snakes. The warinth of our discussion had thawed them out. While we were discussing what we should do, those snakes began demolishing each other, and soon the largest one swallowed the smaller ones, until only two were left. We sent over to the factory for a man to come and get them to be frozen over. Just then they began fighting, and soon the one swallowed the other, and there was only a not pastured, it will often cut a load of single snake left. We fell to disputing hay per acre, worth for winter use even as to who owned him, when he suddenly turned his head, eyed us in a solemn kind of a way, winked his left optic, and, coiling around, placed his tail in his mouth, and, before we suspected what he was about, he swallowed himself. When the man arrived from the factory with a canvas bag all he found was a damp spot on the floor.'
