

Michigan Argus.

A Story for Business Men's Daughters. Now, like a dear good woman, will you please beg papa to buy me that beautiful set of pearls...

Why, mamma, how you astonish me! Why, every one knows papa is very rich, and there is Clara Clinton's mother, who is acknowledged to be a lady of superior taste...

"And I have been forever teasing him about new dresses and jewels. I would not had I known what you say," said Metta Bancroft with tearful eyes.

"Only because, darling," said her mother, "I am anxious for your lessons - perhaps you may be able to turn your education to advantage, and assist your father, should trouble come."

Metta Bancroft was a noble girl. From her infancy she had been the light of home. With a firm will and keen perception of right, she never wavered when she knew her duty, and although reared in affluence, and accustomed to be petted and caressed, she was not spoiled.

"She is a darling," said the mother fondly. "One day I refused to allow her to attend the dancing parties, and she immediately acknowledged the justice of my refusal, and was really troubled to think of the annoyance her many frivolous requests must have caused you."

"I never felt such contempt before," said the father. "Really, people of fashion have no idea of the pleasure they miss."

"And indeed, papa," said Metta, "I find more enjoyment and instruction in teaching my little class than during my association with people of fashion. The character of my pupils is an interesting study; not two are alike. I begin to think I have found my vocation."

"We are all fitted to excel in some particular avocation," said the mother, "and we should seriously endeavor to know in what before we enter upon our career. See my dear girl, the advantage of learning whatever we undertake perfectly. If you had wasted your time and talents in idleness, you would not now be so independent."

Metta grew up to be a true woman; and although she never wore the costly pearls which she saw at Tiffany's, yet in the cabinet of her heart were shrouded those rarer and richer pearls of Modesty, Intelligence, and Virtue.
