EVELYN.
A soft, black eye—so deep, so deep,
Its liquid depth no glance may follow.
A face whose lights and shadows creep
In constant hues of blue and yellow.

with his gender as he was. But it would never do to show ignorance on the subject, so I answered at hazard that it was a boy.

Mark Twain's First Lecture.
I was at home again in San Francisco, without means and without employment. I tortured my brain for a saving scheme, of some kind, and at last a public lecture occurred to me. I sat down and wrote one, in a fever of expectation. I showed it to several friends, but they all shook their heads. They said nobody would come to hear me, and I would make a humiliating failure of it. They said that I had never spoken in public I would break down in the delivery anyhow. I was disconsolate now. But at last an editor stepped me on the back and told me to "go ahead."

Goldwin Smith on Woman's Rights.
Professor Goldwin Smith discusses, in the March number of the Canadian Monthly, the question of Woman's Rights, in a very exhaustive, and, at the same time, very succinct manner. Every plea that has been urged by the advocates of the new theory is examined and tested by pure reason, without reference either to historic or sentiment, the author's aim being not to assert the value and dignity of woman in her present sphere, but to determine whether she can, with advantage, or injurious results to herself, exchange her present sphere for another. Both the temperance of the writer and the locality in which he writes favor a dispassionate consideration of the topic, Goldwin Smith is, in the best sense of the term, an historical scholar, accustomed to gauge all questions without prejudice, from the high plane of philosophic thought, and to augur future results from the realities of the present as influenced by, and growing out of, the past. In England, and in the United States, the question touches only education, and is free from the demagoguery which attaches to it in the United States, and the political use which is made of it by the agitators in England and the United States is equally fortunate, as in Canada, the question touches only education, and is free from the demagoguery which attaches to it in the United States, and the political use which is made of it by the agitators in England and the United States is equally fortunate.

A HURRIED COURTSHIP.
I was a young man, possessed of sufficient means to enable me to live at my ease and refrain from labor of any kind, when suddenly there came a blow which scattered my property to the winds, and I was left with a bare shingle and a pen in the general struggle of gaining a living. The blow came in the shape of the failure of a firm in which all my capital was invested.
