THE OLD BACHELOR.

Silent he sits in his easy chair,
At the close of the Winter's day;
His gaze is fixed on the fichering fire,
And his thoughts are far away.
He thinks of the days when he was young,
And life was full of joy—
When he daily trudged to the village school,
A happy, careless boy.
He thinks of the home of his boyhood's years,
The old farm house on the hill—
Of father, and mother, and sister dear—
And with tears his dim eyes fill;
For they are asleep in the churchyard now,
And he is left alone,
To struggle through life the best he may,
With none to call his own.
He sees in his wision a maiden fair,
With eyes of heavenly blue,
With golden hair, and a winning grace,
And a heart both warm and true.
Fond mem 'ry recalla the shadowy past,
And he seems to live again
In the tender glance of her deep blue eyes,
The happiest man of men.
But, alas for the shortness of earthly bliss!
Death claimed her for his bride,
And, when she passed to the Better Land,
His heart within him died.
Bereft of all that his soul held dear,
Of kindred and of love,
He only waits God's measonger
To summon him above.
His neighbors eall him stern and cold,
And laugh at his lonely life;
And the merry girls with wonder ask,
Why he never takes a wife.
An' little they know of his early love,
And of her, his promised bride;
And little they know, when her life went out,
How his heart within him died.
The world may treat him with laugh and scorn,
He heeds not the cruel jest;
He know that the shafts of ridicule
Are simed at the purest and best,
Alone he plods on his weary way,
For he never can love again;
There are no blue eyes whose tender glance
Can make him the proudest of men.
Silent he sits in his easy chair,
At the close of the Winter's day;
His geze is fixed on the flickering fire,
And his thoughts are far away.

PARSON PHIMSTICKLE'S DESK.

It was an old desk, having belonged to Parson Phimstickle's grandfather; and Parson Phimstickle himself was by no means a young man; so, of course, it was an old desk. And then, indeed, nobody knows who had it before Parson Phimstickle's grandfather came into posession. It might have been some still more remote ancestor, or it might have been the furniture dealer. Parson Phimstickle's daughters were of the former opinion. They were convinced that had belonged to some old English family, who, during the persecution of the Puritans, fled to America, and from whom they, Hannah and Jerusha Phimstickle, were proud to believe themselves

It was a curious desk—so everybody thought. In the lower part there were three large drawers. You turned down the upper, sloping front, and there was a writing-desk, which, when it was closed, concealed very many drawers and pigeon holes of various sizes. Some of these drawers were quite deep and long; others were very shallow and small. Although everybody thought it was a curious desk, nobody suspected how very

A Southern Steamer.

[Louisiana Letter to Cincinnati Commercial.] At Brashear City I went on board a mall steamer which gets up and down the River Teche. This boat, called the Minnie Avery, has an engine of about ten mosquito power. Minnie has a plump bow; a raging fire in her bosom, but the placed demeador of a Dutch frau her a quarter of an hour's start and beat her a quarter of an hour's start and beat her with ease. She stopped, after the manner of horse cars, to pick up passen-gers and leave them, and once when the captain jumped ashore to shake hands with an old friend, it was not found necessary to check the headway of the boat. The two friends walked up the bank of the bayou, and, becoming animated in conversation, shot shead of the boat and disappeared around the bend of the stream half a mile in advance. waiters always came through a small hole in the guards with the dinner on their heads. The barkeeper entered his domain head foremost through a small hole, exhibiting the soles of his shoes in the transit much after the manner of Harlequin in a pantomime, when that sprightly individual leaps through the face of an eight-day clock to escape the pursuit of the clown. The comparison was more obvious and ludicrous from the fact that the thirfty clowns in the boat made a desperate effort to fol-low the barkeeper, but stopped short at the opening and consoled themselves with an infinite variety of intoxicating fluids. county, N. Y., is thus briefly told by the Ithaca Journal: "A little girl named Clark, aged 4 years, was visiting Friday afternoon with her parents at the house of a Mr. Joselyn, a short distance east of the village. A daughter of the latter invited her little visitor to go out to the Muskegon coop and see her chickens. They went together, and as they were passing through the wood-house they were joined by a large dog belonging to Mr. Joselyn. Arriving at the hen-house, the daughter of Mr. Joselyn opened the door and passed in. The little Clark girl, attempting to follow, was set upon by the dog, which so frightened the Joselyn girl that she closed the door of the hen-house. The screams of the girl at length reached the ears of the inmates of the house, who came running to her assistance. When they reached the spot, the dog had his teeth fastened in the child's right arm, rescued, but was horribly mangled. One ear was bitten off, the right cheek bitten out, and a pertion of the scalp torn off. Besides these wounds, both arms were terribly mutilated.
